

Global Warming

Dear Editor,

Many politicians' well-renowned scientists have been telling more common people that global warming has become a hazardous, common trend and that our habits are to blame. They mostly seem to be supporting the "vehicle exhaust is to blame" thing.

Actually, I think humans have no connections to global warming. The earth is naturally getting warm, and this has happened before. A warming trend similar, if not warmer than this, occurred around the Middle Ages when there was no such thing as cars and factories. And CO² is present in the atmosphere. Even if the bigger people were correct about the cause of global warming, we wouldn't be able to do much about it. With the "greenhouse" gases already present, they would keep absorbing heat and we have no way of removing them. So even if we stopped whatever we're doing to produce these gases, things would still get warmer.

I could get more political with my opinions, but I choose not to.

Thank you,

Breanna Lofty
